PREFACE.

There is a good deal of legitimate complaint concerning the present day grammar school course of study. It is charged that our standards are too exacting, our texts too voluminous, our subjects too congested, the teacher's time overcrowded, and a vast mass of work prescribed that must, necessarily, be done in a hasty, helter-skelter manner. In addition to these complaints, and largely as a result of the facts which they allege, come other charges: that an undue percentage of children are over age, that far too many boys and girls drop out before finishing the common school course; that those who stay are thinly plated with an unsubstantial smattering of many things, and really have very little thorough grounding in even the commonest essentials of the common schools.

In an age of criticism, complaint sometimes becomes querulous and unreasonable. Nevertheless, a good deal of the complaint that is made regarding the overcrowding of our curriculum with surplusage is undoubtedly well founded.

Reading, writing, and arithmetic were a generous education in the day of Daniel Boone and those who followed him into the frontier. Taken alone, they no longer constitute a preparation for life. The world has changed and its requirements, standards, and demands have likewise changed. The curriculum of to-day with its reading, writing, arithmetic, spelling, composition, language, grammar, literature, geography, history, civics, physiology, nature study, art, music, domestic science, manual training, and agriculture, consists of subjects as fundamental, when judged by the standards of our time, as was the meager curriculum of the frontier school in its own day. Sufficient unto each day is the curriculum thereof!

The thing we need to do in all our common school subjects is to find their living values. If we can prune out all the dead wood, all the mistletoes of tradition, all the ring-knots of pedantry that have grown in the subject-matter of our courses, we will considerably thin out the tangle.

In the making of text-books and in the organization of courses of study, there should be to-day one primary consideration, namely, what are the fundamental essentials and the necessary minimum standards that shall be established in organizing the subject-matter of each common school course of study? To answer this question we must apply the acid test of general, human usefulness to every detail of the common school course. Those portions of any subject which are dear only to the specialist, which are used only by a small number of men and women, which are survivals of tradition, or which are the sand ballast of the scholarship that concerns itself with subjects rather than with children and their life needs, must be thrown overboard before we will have room for the real cargo and a fair chance to bring it into port.

THE COURSE IN SPELLING.

The course of study in spelling represented by the text-book in current use in the State of California, is fairly water-logged with the surplus of dead-weight ballast that it contains. It consists of over twelve thousand different words. This is four times as many words as any thoughtful estimate based upon an examination of the world's use has prescribed for common school study.

There was a time when a poor word list did not do much acute mischief. In the day when there were but three or four established subjects in the elementary curriculum a teacher might well spend time teaching catch-words, odd words, rare words, and, in general, two or three times as many words as common use required people to write. There may have been then, as we are now assured, grammar school students who could spell every proper name in the Bible, and every word in the unabridged dictionary.

In the crowded curriculum of to-day the teacher can not teach the spelling of all the words in the unabridged dictionary, or all the names in the Bible. Neither has she time for trick-words and tongue-twisters, such as delighted the schoolmaster fifty years ago. She has time, possibly, with earnestness and a clear course of study, to get results that will meet to-day's demands.

But, first of all, there must be a clear course of study.

A LIST OF WORDS IN COMMON WRITTEN USE.

The purpose of the following word list is to provide the teacher with suitable subject-matter for a common school course in spelling. The effort has been made to set in order only such words as are commonly used in writing by Americans of the present day. Frankly, those who prepared this list have followed the simple rule that a word that it is necessary for our children to learn to spell in school is one that there will be a high probability of their having to write at some future time.

It would seem clear that no child should be forced to learn to spell a long array of technical terms because some one child in ten thousand might later become a professor of anatomy; that, in so far as possible, children should not be required to learn to spell long lists of words which would be written only in school and never put to common use later; and that, finally, every child should learn to spell those words which in all probability he and his fellows would find occasion to use more than once in writing, not only in their school lives but later in their outside correspondence and affairs.

The following list is founded upon an examination of the actual use of words, in writing, by a very large number of children and adults. In the first place, it incorporates 542 words found by Dr. Ayres of the Russell Sage Foundation to be most fundamentally common in American written usage.

This Russell Sage Foundation list has been a valuable force in directing thought as to the best way of determining the truth concerning the relative value of material in the course of study. It has brought home the importance of studying results and the superior value of facts as compared with personal opinion in the determination of standards of value.

The word list prepared by Miss Effie McFadden and Dr. Frederic Burk of the State Normal School, San Francisco, California, has also been of material value in the preparation of this list. The San Francisco list consisted of all the words used two or more times in 91 letters, containing a total of 19,288 words. These letters, like those for the most part used in the Ayres investigation, were letters of common correspondence involving simple business transactions, social communications, family letters, love letters, etc. They contained a total of 6,916 different words, but only 840 were found to be used more than twice. This list included and verified most of the words in the Ayres list.

Finally, for this specific work and in addition to the experience of the Ayres investigation and the San Francisco Normal School study, the authors of this list collected 920 compositions, written by children in school from the third to the eighth grade, inclusive, and made a count and an analysis of every word contained therein.

These 920 compositions, selected at random from the city and rural schools of the Chico district, showed substantially all the words that written school exercises of children required them to use. An aggregate of nearly 200,000 words was thus passed over and inspected, and from that number 3,459 different words or different forms of the same words were found to be used.

Some of the words were unusual and had evidently been brought in by children who desired to express an unusual interest or whose experience had been quite apart from that of their fellows. Many proper names were found. A large number of words technically used in teaching grammar and geography, such as subjunctive and equinoctial, had worked their way into the occasional use of the children. All such words, not clearly of common written use in life, were omitted in the final compilation that follows.

There has been much discussion as to whether there should be thirteen thousand or seven hundred words in the spelling word list and the discussion has ranged all the way from the higher to the lower figure. It does not seem possible for us to settle this question by a priori debate, or through any oracular process whatever. The nearest approximation to the truth that we seem to be able to reach is found by listing all the words in common written use outside of school and then to count them. The number of words that we have found as a result of our compilation is 3,470.

This number may seem too many, or it may seem too few to those who glance at it, but we respectfully submit that no offhand opinion will help the matter. New and better evidence will doubtless in time be presented, but it must be based upon a further and better study of general use. If we are ever to get beyond guess work we must set a standard for the selection of our spelling content. The simplest, truest standard is that children should learn to spell in school those words that we find children and adults commonly having need to write. The words in the following spelling list have been tested by this standard.

SOME ADVANTAGES.

There are several substantial gains that come to the teacher and the pupil with a short word list. It is obvious that a standard of spelling accuracy may be secured with a word list of 3,470 words that would not be possible with two, or three, or four times as many words. It is obvious also that the shorter list will make possible a smaller number of new words per day, a better method of presentation, more systematic reviews, and the probability of intelligent, self-directed application in the school and outside writing. These are all important advantages in the short list; but the list was not shortened in order to bring them about. The length of the list has been determined by the standards of common use. Long or short, hard or easy, the children of the land should learn to spell the words which they, in school and out, will be required to write. And it is upon this proposition that the following compilation has been made.

GRADING BASED ON SCHOOL USE.

As has been said, there was an aggregate of 3,459 words in the compositions that served as a basis for original investigation. These words were listed so as to show the number of times every one was used in every half year of the elementary school. In this way the authors had some guide beyond their own conjecture as to where such words were first commonly written by children. It was found, for example, that children in the third and fourth grades did not write the words earth and cottage, but that such words were written by children in the upper grades as follows: earth in the fifth and cottage in the seventh grade. On the other hand, it was found that some harder words, such as neither and piece, were very commonly written in the third and fourth grades and that the composition needs of children in those years seemed, unmistakably, to require their use.

With such modification as suggested itself in order to correct manifest incongruities, the actual experience of children in the use of written English has been accepted substantially as a basis for the grading of the lessons. Provision has, therefore, been made that words shall be taught before the term or year in which they are commonly written; but not so long before as to become stale and forgotten by the time they are to be used.

THE PROGRESS OF THE PUPIL.

In planning the course, a minimum of one hundred and seventy recitations per year has been assumed. There are few schools in which it will be less than this, and many where it will run somewhere between two hundred and two hundred and twenty daily spelling periods. Ordinarily, California rural schools approximate from one hundred and seventy to one hundred and eighty days of school work per annum. Such schools will have no difficulty in teaching this word list in the third to seventh grade, inclusive.

City schools, however, with between one hundred and ninety and two hundred days per annum, should make more rapid progress. In such schools, it will not be impossible for classes to complete the word list before the expiration of the sixth grade.

In any event, it is not important to specify just how long a pupil or a class must take to finish the spelling list. Indeed, it is impossible to state in advance what time will be required in any given case. It is important, however, that every child should make its way through this work, and so far as possible through all other work, as rapidly as thorough instruction and good results may justify. There is no sense in speed based upon inaccuracy and on the other hand there is surely no good reason for undue retardation simply for the purpose of maintaining some preordained schedule of progress.

Progress in rural school and city school alike should be at the rate that experience proves the pupils to be able to go. In the rural school, as has been indicated, the work can be done in the manner suggested, in not more than five years, from the third to the seventh grade, inclusive. In the city schools, with their longer terms, it may be possible to teach the course thoroughly in four years, from the third to the sixth, inclusive.

ARRANGEMENT BY GRADES.

Formal spelling is generally begun in the second or third grade. The plan proposed here suggests the introduction of work in the third grade. Children do very little writing before the third grade, and have little chance to use and limited opportunity to review such spelling as they may be taught. At the same time, a considerable amount of incidental spelling is acquired in connection with the reading and language work of the first and second years. The lessons planned here for the third grade may be begun in the second, should school authorities desire it that way.

In the first year of spelling, whether it be in the third or second grade, two new words a day are taught. The new word list increases at the rate of one per year until in the seventh grade six new words are introduced every day. With a short new word list it is possible to teach as well as to assign the new words.

The number of new words introduced in each grade is as follows: third grade, 340; fourth grade, 530; fifth grade, 700; sixth grade, 880; seventh grade, 1,020; total for the grammar grade course, 3,470.

The Appendix contains a list of 462 additional words.

METHODS OF TEACHING SPELLING.

The plan of assigning children every day a list of from ten to twenty words and asking them to go home and learn them by themselves, is, on the whole, unsuccessful. Some children, under such circumstances, can teach themselves how to spell. Indeed, we have heard of a number of great men who received practically all of their education outside of school; but we do not accept these isolated facts as a foundation for the theory that school instruction is unnecessary.

The public schools are founded upon the theory, and we believe it to be a sound one, that a competent teacher interested in her work can teach a child better than he can teach himself. That is to say, such a teacher can direct a child's attention, shape his environment, stimulate his interest, and organize his energies in such a way that he will learn in less time and to better purpose than if he were cut adrift or forced to pick up his information around the neighborhoood. For this general reason, but more specifically because in a general, practical way it has abundantly proved its worth, we suggest and urge that this word list be taught. In the long run it will be easier for the teacher and much better for the children if, instead of passing groups of words to the children for instruction each day, a systematic method is employed.

The method that is suggested consists of the following principal parts: 1. Instruction; 2. Study; 3. Lesson hearing; 4. Correction of errors; 5. Review.

INSTRUCTION.

Spelling may be successfully taught with text-books in the hands of the children, or with but one text-book in each classroom and that in the hands of the teacher. The latter plan may be a little more difficult to handle, but has one important advantage. It absolutely insures a certain amount of instruction at the time the lesson is assigned.

Assuming, then, that the children are without texts, the teaching of the new lesson is taken up in the following fashion: The children are at their seats with pencil and paper. The teacher pronounces from the text the first new word of the next lesson. The children pronounce the word individually and in chorus and use it in sentences of their own making. The teacher uses it in sentences of her making for the purpose of more clearly defining and illustrating its values. Then the teacher writes the word on the board. The children spell it from the board individually, then in chorus. The class may then trace it in the air, spelling in chorus as they do so. Finally, the children write it on their study slips.

Each succeeding new word is treated in the same manner. In case recent reviews have indicated that any word has been poorly learned in a former lesson, it should be retaught with the new words.

The time required for careful instruction in the two new words regularly assigned for each day in the third grade might properly range from two to three minutes. In the seventh grade the six words taught will require from five to seven minutes. It may be objected that this takes time. It does, but in the long run it saves a great deal of time to both teacher and child, for it prevents the blundering, wasteful business of first errors, and renders unnecessary that most difficult educational process—the correction of mistakes. It will take less time in small classes of two and three in rural schools than in the larger classes, ranging from forty to sixty, in city departments. In any case, enough time should be put upon the introduction of a new word to assure the teacher that every child in the class has given it attention and has had impressed upon his memory its correct form by hearing, seeing, saying, and writing it.

STUDY.

The pupils must be required to give their study list, containing the new words that have been taught them as above described, enough attention to strengthen and impress their knowledge of the spelling. This study time should be provided at school and in class.

The spelling study should not immediately precede the written lesson. Otherwise, it may become a mere cram for a temporary knowledge sufficient to tide over the hearing of the day's lesson. The amount of time required for studying the two new words a day taught in the third grade, and the six new words taught in the seventh, will range possibly from four to eight minutes. A longer time in either case will probably mean mere diffusion of attention. If necessary, because of departmental system or program requirements, the teacher may provide time for the study of the advanced lesson at the beginning of the spelling period; then assign and teach the new words for the next day; and then proceed with the written lesson based upon yesterday's assignment. This will provide at least a minimum interval between the study and the hearing of the lesson.

LESSON HEARING.

In this the children should use some one of the better forms of spelling blanks, preferably those that provide for detaching each day the lesson of the day before as written and finally corrected, and that contain stubs on which misspelled words may be correctly written. With pen and ink, and such blanks before them, the children write the words of the lesson as the teacher dictates them. Each word should be distinctly pronounced once. In case a word is a homonym—that is, pronounced the same as another word but spelled differently—as in the case of our or hour, bare or bear, then the teacher must use the word in a sentence to indicate clearly just which one of the two is meant. Homonyms should always be treated separately. To associate them, either in the instruction or the review, is artificially to create a confusion that naturally does not exist and that may easily be avoided.

In the case of words that are spelled the same but pronounced differently, such as lives and lives, the teacher will, of course, indicate the word she means by the pronunciation that she gives it. A foot note will be found in the case of all such words, illustrating the use of these words in sentences. These words that are spelled the same but pronounced differently, should be given one pronunciation and the corresponding meaning in the first lesson, and the other pronunciation and meaning in some of the subsequent reviews. In this way, without confusion, the class will learn that the same spelling really stands for two or more entirely different words and each of them will be carefully and separately taught and reviewed.

As each word is pronounced the children should write it, without hesitation or delay. From ten to fifteen seconds is ample time in which each word may be pronounced and written. When a child can not write a word promptly he has not safely learned how to spell it. The surest sign of a poor speller is hesitation.

In the third grade there are two new and eight review words, a total of ten to be written in each daily test. The pronunciation and writing of each lesson will, therefore, require from two to three minutes. In the seventh grade there are twenty words—six new and fourteen review. The time required there for the daily lesson hearing will not be much longer than in the third grade, for the children are able to write more rapidly. Even with the increased number of words, the lesson in the seventh grade may be written in three or four minutes.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS.

After the words have been written the pupils should pass their papers and the teacher should dictate the spelling slowly and distinctly while each child grades his neighbor's spelling lesson. The papers should then be returned to their owners. Any word misspelled should be corrected immediately by writing it in correct form on the stub provided for that purpose. Words thus misspelled and corrected shall be assigned to the individuals concerned for special study, together with the new words in the next day's assignment.

In classes where this or similar systematic methods of instruction are followed, misspelled words will be few. Classes will be one hundred per cent correct in their daily lessons as a rule rather than as an exception. But, in any case, if a word is found to be commonly misspelled it should be retaught by the teacher along with the new words in the next lesson and it should be reviewed more often thereafter than is regularly provided in the word list.

SYSTEMATIC REVIEWS.

No matter how well spelling may be taught, permanent results will depend in large part upon the character of the reviews. The absence of regular systematic reviews in spelling and other formal subjects is one of the reasons why our results are often not as permanent and our instruction not as thorough as we would wish.

An automatic, cumulative review is provided in this course for all words taught. Each day's lesson is principally review. If a new word has been taught, it is, of course, repeated the next day by means of the written spelling. Thereafter, it passes automatically into a review system. Its first reappearance is three days after it is taught, at which time it appears as one of the review words in the written spelling lesson. It appears again within a short time and thereafter it passes in rotation before the pupil for review again and again in future lessons.

All words of reasonable difficulty appear at least five times. Some of the harder words, however, have been introduced more often, and some of the easier ones have been given a smaller number of repetitions.

The teacher should use the stub upon which the children have corrected their misspelled words as an index to the special need of students and the class as a whole. Words commonly found there should be reviewed more often than is regularly provided in the word list.

Twenty-two words, such as cat and dog, have been introduced directly into the reviews of the first few lessons. It is assumed that children will have been taught these words in their reading and language work and will need no instruction in their spelling. Nevertheless, in order to test the validity of the assumption, the words have been introduced once by way of review.

A final review has been added at the end for the purpose of giving adequate repetition and drill of the spelling of the words that were taught in the last lessons of the series.

AVOID UNNECESSARY INSTRUCTION AND REVIEW.

The spelling of most of the words printed as new words in the first one hundred lessons may be already known to the children. If this be true, the fact will be immediately detected by the teacher when the words are taken up for instruction, and most of the time ordinarily spent in that work may be saved. In case it is obvious that any word is already known by the class, time should not be spent in teaching it.

Similarly, the teacher may see that many of the simpler words of the first lessons and some of the later words do not need as many reviews as are provided. In this case such words should, of course, be dropped.

In case the number of review words per lesson be found too many because of lack of time and other program demands, the teacher may omit each day from the written lesson two or three or four of the words which the pupils have learned most thoroughly.

A SIMPLE, TIME-TESTED METHOD.

There is nothing new or startling about the method that is here proposed. Good teachers have long used it and many text-books describe it in their introductions. It is simple, direct, and practical.

The teacher will note that all by-play in the way of pictures, games, story telling, nature study, literary-gem hunting, and other affiliated diversions have been kept out of the suggested method. It will be noted also that we have omitted word analysis, the study of diacritical marking, and the presentation of spelling rules, more honored in the breach than in the observance. This has been done that time and attention may be withheld from content and methods of a speculative sort and concentrated upon results definitely desirable and wholly within the reach of any class and teacher.

Throughout the work, the teacher should keep a careful record of the progress of her children and the averages of her class. With a reasonable interest upon her own part in the result, it will not be hard to awaken in the class and the whole community an interest in the spelling records of the boys and girls. The spelling match and interclass contest will, under sound management, help to establish helpful rivalry. Best of all incentives is the personal pride that every child may be led to feel in keeping his own record clean. Children like to do the things they can do well, and there is no reason why any child should not usually be perfect in a well graded, well taught spelling course. As in all formal work, the spelling lesson should be brisk and filled with quick action and response.

RESULTS.

This course aims to include only the words that people commonly need to write. It seeks to put the teacher's time upon spelling essentials that are one hundred per cent worth while to all the children of the elementary schools.

If the spelling of this minimum list of words is to be taught in such a way as to produce maximum efficiency, it must be taught in such a way as to get permanent results. There is no use to have known how to spell a word and to have forgotten it, or to have known how to spell it and to have half-forgotten it. Words that may just as well be taught and forgotten may very much better be left out entirely. There is no dead wood in the list that follows, and every word there should be taught and remembered.

It may seem that undue emphasis has been placed upon instruction and that some of the reviews herein are redundant. Perhaps, in some cases, this may be found to be true; if so, the justification is that we are here trying to secure definite and lasting results and have suggested a safe margin of efficiency in the teaching. When it comes to real essentials, we would rather be too thorough than too slack.

The whole plan and purpose of this course is very simple: it proposes a word list without surplusage and a direct, simple method, adequate to insure results. It is the purpose of this combination to give to all the children of the elementary schools, thoroughly and in lasting form, the ability to spell the words that later school and life demands will commonly require them to write.

APPENDIX.

The following list of 462 additional words has been printed so that schools with excess energy and time may find a list containing supplementary spelling material.

These words, as proved by the facts, are not as commonly written as the ones that have been placed in the list. They may be said to occupy a middle ground between the words rarely used in writing and the words commonly used.

Many of them are words commonly encountered in reading and in general oral use, and therefore are a part of our working vocabulary. Some of them may be common enough in the written use of teachers and others upon whom special demands are made. Nevertheless, the fact is, they are not in general written use and therefore can not fairly be included in a course of study that aims to serve the needs of all.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL,
CHICO, CALIFORNIA.

PUBLICATIONS.

BULLETINS.

Bulletin No. 1. School Gardens for California Schools.

A manual and teacher's guide in the making of school gardens, especially designed to meet the conditions of California schools. Illustrated, 80 pages, 30 cents postpaid. B. M. Davis, Chico State Normal School.

Bulletin No. 4. Lesson Plans in Arithmetic.

A series of lesson plans on notation and numeration, subtraction, division of common fractions, division of decimals, mensuration of the rectangle, surveying heights, and cash account. 17 pages, 10 cents postpaid. A. W. Stamper, Chico State Normal School.

Bulletin No. 5. Part I, Map Geography.
Part II, Journey Geography for Beginners.

96 pages, 30 cents postpaid. C. K. Studley, Chico State Normal School.

Bulletin No. 6. Geography Course of Study (for use in the Fifth and Sixth grades).

A series of lesson plans assisting the teacher in preparing and presenting an introductory course in Geography. It follows the California State Series introductory geography text and is designed to lighten the work of the teacher and at the same time bring out the true values of the subject. 82 pages, 25 cents postpaid. C. K. Studley, Chico State Normal School.

Bulletin No. 7. A Spelling Course for Elementary Schools.

A series of spelling lessons consisting of words in common written use. These words are introduced a few at a time and adequate reviews are systematically provided. The introduction sets forth some fundamental principles of spelling methods. 112 pages, 25 cents postpaid. C. K. Studley and Allison Ware, Chico State Normal School.

Outline Maps.

A series of nine maps designed for use in teaching Map Geography and to accompany Part I, Bulletin 5. These maps afford the basis for a valuable type of seat work and provide an unusually effective drill in the teaching of map geography. Postpaid, per set of nine, 15 cents. C. K. Studley, Chico State Normal School.

Address all orders and inquiries, and make all payments to the Bulletin Fund, State Normal School, Chico, California.
